These cans were stored in the basement of the California Academy of Sciences for 14 years and exposed to the salt air of the Steinhart Aquarium for the last 6 years. It is unclear what caused the rust to form in these patterns, but it is likely the result of some type of crystal growth.
"hello fishes"
DAYLAY (2013, lucky dragons) was produced under the auspices of both the Exploratorium’s Outdoor Gallery and Center for Art and Inquiry, as an interactive exhibit situated within a fourteen-foot diameter circular hole in the publicly-accessible area of Pier 15, directly adjacent to The Embarcadero. Two signs, each with an identical explanatory text and microphone, were placed along a railing that circled the hole. Four speakers and a ring of LED lights were suspended out of sight beneath the rim of the hole. The lights faded up as the sun set, and faded down as the sun rose—“photic memory,” as a staff scientist commented. The microphones continued to record, and the speakers to play back, more or less uninterrupted for eighteen months, from May 2013 to November 2014.

The exhibit was designed to perpetually record sounds and then play them back in the same location after a twelve-hour interval, all sounds being subject to the same delay without discrimination: seagulls, trolley cars, skateboarders, church bells, school groups, office workers, tourists, families, lovers, foghorns, delivery trucks, queries, fantasies, confessions, wind, rain, screaming children; the audibly prudent thoughts that occupy people of all ages speaking into the void. Our intent was to produce two irreconcilable results: on the one hand, to render a realistic portrait of the natural and social sounds of one time overlaid onto another time (a sort of factual window for listening through to a different time at the same location), and on the other hand, to invite visitors to contemplate and engage with their own imaginary experience of this other time—to actively touch the other (as yet non-existent) time. Our project here is to examine the feedback loop produced by these twin results, not by categorizing, but by presenting their complexity verbatim.

Is the relevant learning experience to be found in focused attention on sound (both as a material and a signifying medium)? Is the exhibit’s primary purpose to play back / to present for the listener, or to offer, in the process of time-shifting, a platform for experimental performance? We propose that a relevant learning experience can be found in the creation, by speakers and listeners alike, of a common imaginary, a virtual space for contemplation external to our lived experience. I wonder where my voice went (what does it do for twelve hours?). I consider the qualities of a moment lost inside a vast duration. I switch places with the listener, bringing a message backwards from the future into the past. Why not?

Taken as a continuous document, the recorded messages present a rapid and unpredictable montage of emotional forms. Some speakers invoke complex and playful narratives consisting of interactions between multiple characters, story-lines, and time-space locations. Other speakers laugh or curse when nothing is obviously funny or upsetting, leaving an embarrassed phantom shocked at its own creepiness; uncanny for being a recording, and irresponsible for being delayed.

Why speak, if the audience can’t be verified? Paranoia interrupts, the un-knowable listener is cast as “inhuman,” albeit an inhuman that we share space with and can communicate with: “Nobody” will be there / “Nobody” was here—or “Whoever is here, I hate you,” “I will kill you,” “I hope you die,” and so on. Often this takes gentler forms, as interspecies communication (whale song, “Sharks come out!”, “Hello, fishes!” etc.), or command utterances seeking a cure for disarray: “Go to work!”, “Go Home!”, “Get a job!”, “Go to sleep!”, “I hope to be at home safe.” For a group encountering the piece all at once, the mania of showing off, along with a tendency towards imitation, results in funny looping stutters, as variations on the roles of teacher, student, reporter, monster, victim, etc. are worked out.

How do we rationally understand a time scale or duration outside of what we are able to sense? Every interaction is also a test of the channel’s openness, a question uselessly waiting for an answer to travel across an interval that, while not impossible, is improbable for anyone finding themselves at the installation site to directly experience. Leaving a message as a ‘proof’ or ‘truth’ of a proposition that is un-testable (un-thinkable?) in the present moment engages a need very close to our own desire to collect and convey these messages, first through the mechanism itself, and now through these eavesdropped transcriptions. In the act of composing messages for future listeners, each speaker has given a unique form to the sensation of holding one’s attention in two times at once. As artists-in-residence transiently interacting with communities of practice, our research is presented beside the work of explanation and inquiry carried out by visitors and staff every day. In the usage described by Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick: “Beside comprises a wide range of desiring, identifying, representing, repelling, paralleling, differentiating, rivaling, leaning, twisting, mimicking, withdrawing, attracting, aggressing, warping, and other relations.” As artistic research, this project is not to essentialize, nor to act as role-model or interrogator, but primarily to listen, and to provide forms that are able to preserve contradiction.

3 Our use of the term “virtual” here to indicate a thing made primarily to be perceived is drawn from Susanne Langer’s “Feeling and Form” (New York: Charles Scribner’s Sons, 1953)

Hello?

My name is Marcus Mack.

Twelve hours from now, you will be hearing this. Twelve hours in the future, call my phone …

Hello?

Hello?

TWELVE HOURS LATER!
I'm watching you.

Hello, how are you?

Hello, this message is for Joe Schmo.

Hi there.

Are you enjoying looking down at me?
Well, since this is going to record in the next twelve hours or so, I would like to say that this museum (by museum I mean Exploratorium) is awesome, but what they need is they need a map that is really, really detailed, so you can find your way around. They should also have a recommended section, and... I don't know what else, something really really awesome. A cheese exhibit. Oh! And they should add shovels to those sand wheel things. They need something to put the sand back on the wheel.

How's it going YOLO? Hashtag.

Oh this is your friend from Brazil! How do I have this accent from India? I am actually from Brazil. And... I think this a nice message. Alright bye-bye.

Hello, how are you doing?

I like Minecraft.

I see you, you little...

I'm going to get you!

Hello.

Hello goodbye

Goodbye.

We see you. Hmmm. You... Hmmm. Oh Manem...

I see you.
Two years ago, I bet my girlfriend that she couldn't read “Infinite Jest” in three months. She did, I had to buy her dinner, and two years later, she's still telling me to read it. Who's the winner here?

I'm the winner. You should definitely read it, it's amazing. I actually read it in about three weeks.

The worst part is that this is going to get played back at six in the morning. None of you fuckers are going to hear this. Story of my life.

Also, we're tourists, so if you go to England you should definitely visit Manchester, it's one of the best cities ever.

Love from London!

Oh yeah, and I'm from Manchester, I don't have an actually Mancunian accent because I moved away, but it's like, I'm from fucking Manchester, fucking best city ever.
Hola, hace rato dije un par de cosas tontas, pero lo que nos trajo aquí por segunda ocasión, pues fue el amor que nos tenemos, el amor que tenemos con los amigos y los demás. No sé si estamos mejor o igual que hace dos años que venimos pero espero que […] a un lugar mejor, más lleno de amor y de cordialidad. Espero, cuando escuchen esto, sea un mundo mejor, que el mundo sea un mejor lugar.
Hello hello
This is your inner voice speaking.

Night creatures, we want to see you guys, in the day, we don’t want to see you guys in the night. Are you guys aliens? Where do you guys live? Like, what’s your deal, like? Like, we want to see one of you guys here, like, on the Earth, and then people can like, get freaked out and stuff, because like, we want to see you guys. like, it’s time. Or at least leave a sign, in the next, like, week, like, do something, like a maze or something, like, somewhere close, so the world can see that you guys are alive, like, leave a message or something. Ok bye!

Hello?
Hello
"What's 'then', then?"
"Live from the future, children"
"I am the person"

"You are the ghost, I am the person"
Eavesdropping as visitors compose (or de-compose) messages for their twelve-hours-later counterparts, the impulse to transcribe and analyze what is heard takes on a grotesque aspect. While each message, as a self-contained performance, is based on the very fragile promise of one’s voice returning after a time to find its maybe-audience, what is the basis for listening in? Conversation is impossible on such a time-scale. Passive listening is un-predictable and unnerving, each fragment impossibly disconnected from what comes before or after.

So treat them as fragments, or better yet, unstable elements, each letter dispersing in a cloudy swirl before the word takes form:

(Words and phrases excerpted from the transcripts, handwritten with ink on water and transferred to paper)

The image on the cover of this book is from United States Patent Number 6,000,803:
“IMAGE GENERATING METHOD AND APPARATUS” (pictured in full to the left): “…an efficient and versatile system for generating and displaying a portrait or other graphic image from an array of variously sized points of light.”

The inventor, Bob Miller (1935—2007), one of the first artists to work at the Exploratorium, remains the archetype for its artist-as-researcher-as-developer in residence. The exhibits he designed for the museum elude easy solutions, expanding to meet whatever patient curiosity one gives them. Elegantly occupying multiple ways of knowing the world, his work suggests making use of attention itself as a creative medium. ...And we are drawn into conversation, through the reciprocal gesture of a questioning stance.
